A SHORT SKETCH

OF THE

MILITARY OPERATIONS ON THE DELAWARE, DURING THE LATE WAR.

THE differences which had so long subsisted between the United States and Great Britain, and which had led to the various measures of the restrictive system finally resulted in war, which was declared by Congress on the 18th day of June, 1812. The building and fitting out of some gun-boats and privateers in the port of Philadelphia, the repairing of the ordnance at Fort Mifflin, and some measures preparatory to placing that fortification in a state of defence, constituted almost the whole of the military operations which took place on the Delaware during that year.

So early as the month of March of 1813, the blockade of the Delaware, which had been constantly anticipated from the period at which hostilities were proclaimed, was commenced by Commodore Sir John P. Berresford, with the Poictiers seventy-four, the frigate Belvidere Capt. Byron, and an occasional reinforcement of other vessels, and was prosecuted with such rigour as to cut off the chief part of the foreign commerce of Philadelphia. In the course of that month, the enemy were several times repulsed by the militia of Delaware, in attempts to capture small vessels close in with the shore, and some instances occurred of sharp firing between the contending parties.

On the 16th of March a communication was made to the inhabitants of Lewistown, a small town situate near Cape Hen-open, and in sight of the cruizing ground of the British, by Commodore Berresford, in which he made a demand upon them for "twenty live bullocks, with a proportionate quantity of vegetables and hay," promising payment at the Philadelphia prices, but threatening in case of non-compliance, to destroy their town. This civil epistle was addressed "to the first magistrate of Lewistown," and as might have been anticipated, was received by the people with hearty indignation. A positive refusal was returned, and the enemy were given to understand that they could expect nothing but what they could obtain by force.

The intelligence of this menace, with the probability of its being put into execution, soon spread along the shores of the Delaware, and aroused the dormant feelings of those who fancied that the destroying power of the enemy would chiefly be exercised on the ocean. At Lewistown a considerable body of militia immediately assembled, and at Dover, Smyrna, New-Castle and Wilmington, measures for assisting to repel the invaders were promptly entered upon. Volunteer corps were formed, and batteries to protect the two latter towns were soon constructed. The specie of the banks of New-Castle and Wilmington was removed for safety to Philadelphia, and every arrangement was made for an expected invasion. Two volunteer companies at Philadelphia, viz. the Independent Blues, Captain Mitchell, and the Junior Artillerists, a company of spirited and respectable young men associated for the purpose in three days notice, under the command of Capt. Jacob H. Fisler, volunteered to garrison Fort Mifflin, and were accepted for that service on the 22d of March. *

* On the discharge of these two companies from their duty at the Fort, the following complimentary order was issued.

Head Quarters, 4th Military District,
Philadelphia, April 7, 1813.

GENERAL ORDERS.

General Bloomfield cannot permit Capt. Mitchell and Fisler's companies of the militia of Philadelphia to leave Fort Mifflin, without expressing his satisfaction and thanks for their promptness and alacrity, in the tender of their services to the United States, to garrison fort Mifflin, on the first intimation of the present emergency; and his entire approba-

On the 23d of March, the Governor of Delaware having arrived at Lewistown, communicated to Commodore Beresford an official reply to his letter of the 16th., urging the entire impossibility of his requisition being complied with, and on the same day received for answer, that as the demand was neither ungenerous nor wanting in magnanimity, the Commodore felt it incumbent on him to persist in his determination, and, said he, "whatever sufferings may fall upon the inhabitants of Lewis, must be attributed to yourselves, by not complying with a request so easily acquiesced in." Notwithstanding the repetition of the threat, nothing was done until the 6th of April. On the evening of that day, the Belvidera, with several small vessels, came close in to Lewistown, and commenced an attack by firing several thirty-two pound shot into the town, after which a flag was sent on shore with a renewal of the enemy's demand, accompanied by an additional one, for a supply of water. To this message, Colonel Samuel B. Davis, who commanded the troops, returned for answer that, neither could be complied with. Capt. Byron in reply, expressed his regret at the distress which would be brought upon the women and children of the village, by the pertinacious refusal of their friends to comply with the demand of Sir John, and earnestly desired that they might be instantly removed. Colonel Davis very politely returned him for answer that "he had already taken care of the ladies." The firing soon after commenced, and a regular bombardment was kept up for twenty-two hours, during which time it was calculated that near one thousand shot of eighteen and thirty-two pounds, were fired tion of their zeal, activity and patience at Fort Mifflin, in the discharge of the duty of citizen soldiers. Their patriotic example will be emulated by the numerous companies of militia who have offered to repair to the standard of their country.

Much credit is due to captains Barker and Williams of the 2d Regiment U. S. Artillery, for their unwearied diligence in the exercise and improvement of the militia in garrison duty.

The General acknowledges his obligations to General Wharton and Colonel Dunne, adjutant-general of this district, for the advantage derived from their intelligence and assistance.

at the place, besides shells and congreve rockets. Many houses were damaged, but no lives were lost. At the commencement of the bombardment, our troops were in want of ammunition, but soon receiving a supply of powder from their friends and of balls from the enemy, which fitted the calibre of their picces exactly, they were able to maintain a pretty vigorous fire. On the afternoon of the 7th, preparations were made by the enemy to land, and several small vessels full of men approached the shore, where a gallant band was prepared to meet them, but they were called back by a signal from the squadron. Thus ended an affair which reflected as much dishonour upon the British arms, as it did credit upon the inhabitants of Lewistown and its vicinity, who were prepared to make every sacrifice rather than to submit to the odious act of aiding and abetting their country's foes.

The attack on Lewistown was but a specimen of the marauding course which was in store for the inhabitants of our defenceless villages. Whilst these scenes were acting on the Delaware, Admiral George Cockburn, whose unprincipled system of plunder will be ever held in execration by those who respect the laws of honourable warfare, commanded the British forces in the waters of the Chesapeake. Having ascended the bay, he on the 29th of April made an attack upon Frenchtown, a small place consisting of not more than six or eight houses and stores, the latter of which containing merchandize to the value of many thousands of dollars, belonging to Philadelphia and Baltimore merchants, were destroyed. On the 3d of May at day light, the town of Havre-de-grace situate on the west side of the Susquehanna, two miles from its mouth, was bombarded, and the defenceless inhabitants driven from their beds. The resistance made to the landing of the enemy who had approached in nineteen barges, by the few militia which could be assembled, was slight, and no sooner had they reached the shore, than they became busily occupied in destroying the houses. To use the words of a writer who has very minutely described the scene, "they set fire to those which had not been injured by their shells, broke the furniture, and cut open the bedding of the citizens to augment the flames; destroyed the public stages, maimed the horses, cut to pieces the private baggage of the passengers, tore the clothing of some of the inhabitants from their backs, and left to others those only which they wore. Women and children flying in every direction to avoid a relentless foe, and to seek protection from their own countrymen, were insulted by the morose seamen and marines; and the only house which yet remained entirely uninjured, was sought by one and all as an assylum.”*

Such conduct on the part of a hostile force which had penetrated into the heart of the country by the Chesapeake, and which it is said occasionally ascended the Delaware bay so as to be visible from New-Castle, gave the first impulse to that military spirit amongst our citizens, which at a more advanced stage of the war, became so universal. It had so happened, that almost ever since the disbanding of those respectable corps, known by the name of Macpherson's Blues and Shee's Legion, the former in 1800, and the latter in 1811, the volunteer system had fallen much into disrepute. A few companies of active and aspiring young men had at different periods been formed, but their duration in general was short, and it was almost in vain to attempt to withstand the popular opinion, which was decidedly averse to military parade. So strong indeed was this feeling, that at the period when war was declared, there were in existence within the city and Liberties of Philadelphia, not more than three or four volunteer companies of infantry, and as many of cavalry, neither of which contained more than half their compliment of effective men. Prejudice however was at length compelled to yield to necessity, and even amongst those whose families and connections were principled against the bearing of arms, there were not wanting a patriotic few, who conceived that the defence of their country was amongst their chief duties. Under the influence of this spirit, the organization of volunteer companies commenced, and preparations were made for opening the first campaign.

* “Historical sketches of the late war between the United States and Great Britain,” by John Lewis Thomson. For particulars also of the destruction of Franchtown and Havre-de-grace, see Niles’ Weekly Register for May 1813.

THE FIRST CAMPAIGN.

The depredations committed by the British on the Chesapeake, and their menacing attitude on the Delaware, rendered it absolutely necessary that a force should be embodied to repel their aggressions. With this view a detachment of militia was ordered to be drafted for the service of the United States. No sooner was this measure known, than the Philadelphia Blues, and Independent Volunteers, two old and respectable companies, united with the Washington Guards, which had become organized in March and was the first new company of infantry formed after the commencement of the war, in offering their services to the government in lieu of the contemplated militia draft. Their offer was accepted, and after having been mustered and inspected, the detachment marched from the city for the state of Delaware on the afternoon of the 13th of May, under the command of Colonel Lewis Rush. It encamped for the night a short distance below Gray's ferry, where in consequence of a severe rain on the succeeding day, it was detained until near noon of the 15th, on the evening of which day it arrived and quartered at Chester. On the 16th, it passed through Wilmington, and pitched upon a field about a mile below that town, and on the morning of the 17th reached Staunton a village on the Baltimore road, six miles from Wilmington, about a mile from which a permanent encampment was formed. This spot was selected by General Bloomfield, then commander of the district as an eligible spot for a camp of observation, on account of its proximity to the water of the Delaware and Chesapeake. New-Castle on the left was but six miles distant, and the Head of Elk where the British had landed during the war of the Revolution, immediately preceding the battle of Brandywine, and where it was thought probable from their movements, they again intended to annoy the country, was but seventeen miles. It was supposed that a force of three hundred and fifty men, aided by the volunteers of Delaware would be amply sufficient to repulse any body of the enemy which would probably be landed on either side, and orders were given to send out occasional scouting parties to collect information, to obtain a knowledge of the surrounding country, and to watch the movements of the foe, should any attempt be made to disembark his troops. These parties under the command of a commissioned officer, extended their reconnoitering excursions as far as Christiana, Newark, New-Castle and even Elkton.

On Sunday the 29th of May, an express reached Wilmington, informing that two frigates, one sloop of war and a tender were ascending the Delaware under a press of sail, with a fair wind.—The drums beat to arms, and the several volunteer corps assembled at their respective posts. Intelligence of the expected attack, with the usual exaggerated reports was soon conveyed to the camp, and inspired the troops with a vigour not before exhibited. Even those who were under the surgeon's care, were instantly cured of their infirmities, buckled on their arms and stood in the ranks prepared for a march. The whole country was in consternation, and all believed that the enemy was at hand. The Independent Blues, was ordered down to New-Castle, whilst the other two companies stood by their arms, prepared to proceed towards Christiana, or in any other direction from which the enemy might approach.—All was life and activity, and the ambitious spirits who had long been indulging the hope of distinction on the field of battle, already fancied their anticipations realized. But their hopes were short-lived. The alarm proved to be groundless; some barges had appeared higher up the bay than usual, and in their course had been magnified to a small fleet of ships. The Independent Blues remained under arms at New-Castle during the night, and on the following afternoon returned to camp.

A rumour about this time having obtained currency, that the enemy purposed to ascend the Delaware, and to attempt the destruction of the extensive powder mills on the Brandywine, Colonel Rush was ordered to take up a new position with his troops on Shellpot hill, three miles north of Wilmington, one from the Delaware, and about half way between the latter and the main Philadelphia road. This position was high and healthy, commanded a complete view of the river as far down as New-Castle, and covered Hamilton's landing, the only practicable point near the Brandywine, where a debarkation could have been effected. The detachment left their ground near Staunton, on the 2d of June, and on the same day reached their new station, where they continued without any active service until the month of July. The daily drills and battallion exercises, with the nightly posting of picket guards at the landing on the river, tended to perfect the men in their discipline and duties, and it would certainly not be going too far to say, that their appearance and knowledge of military movements, had never before been surpassed by the same number of volunteers in the service of the United States.

The heat of the weather rendering it ineligible to continue an encampment too long upon the same spot, the detachment was marched on, or about the 12th. of July to Oak Hill near Stille's run, about four miles south of Dupont's powder mills, and about the same distance west from Wilmington. Here it continued until the final order for return, which took place after the British had descended the Chesapeake to wage their predatory warfare upon the defenceless towns situated near the mouth of the bay. The camp was broken up on the 26th of July, and the troops reached Chester on that night, and Philadelphia on the afternoon of the succeeding day. In the neighbourhood of the lower ferry, they were met by a number of the volunteer corps of cavalry and infantry, who had prepared for them a grateful repast at the Woodlands, and were escorted into the city, where they were dismissed in front of the State House.

In calling the attention of our old companions to the scenes of this year, it would be doing injustice to the inhabitants of the State of Delaware in the neighbourhood of whom the several encampments of the detachment were formed, to omit to notice the liberal hospitality displayed by them. No civility or accommodation, calculated to render the situation of the troops agreeable, was withheld, and it was a source of pleasing reflection to the detachment, that those whom they were sent immediately to defend, were every way worthy to be defended. Great credit is also due to the inhabitants of Wilington, New-Castle and their vicinities for their promptness in organizing corps for defence. Two companies of infantry composed of the workmen at the factories on the Brandywine, were organized, uniformed and equipped, under the command of the two Messrs. Dupont. One troop of Cavalry was also raised in the same neighbourhood, and placed under the command of William Young, esq. An excellent corps of Artillery, commanded by Cæsar A. Rodney, esq. was embodied at Wilmington, and a fine company of Infantry was raised at New-Castle under the command of Nicholas Vandyke esq. These corps, with the addition of captain John Warner's troop of horse, captain Wilson's company of Artillery, and captain Leonard's company of Infantry, although not actually in the field, stood prepared at a moment's warning, to unite with the Pennsylvania force, in opposing the operations of the enemy.

Just about the time of the return of this detachment to the city, an affair took place in the Delaware bay, which reflected great credit upon some of our young naval officers. It is so well described in Mr. Thomson's book, that we shall again take the liberty of using his own words for it.

"A merchant sloop, having entered the bay on the 22d. of July, on her return from sea was cut off by the Martin sloop of war, which had just re-appeared in the Delaware. The sloop ran aground to avoid capture; and although she was afterwards attacked by a tender and four barges well manned and armed, a hasty collection of militia with one field piece, under lieutenant Townsend, drove off her assailants, and saved the sloop.

"A detachment of the gun boat flotilla, being at this time but a few miles off, were apprized of the attack made by the sloop of war, and captain Angus immediately proceeded down the bay, with eight gun boats and two block sloops. On the 29th, he discovered the Martin, grounded slightly on the outer ridge of Crow's shoals, and determined to attack her in that situation, he anchored his squadron within three quarters of a mile of the enemy, and opened a fire from the whole line. The

Junon frigate came up to the assistance of the sloop of war, and anchored within half a mile below her. Between both of the enemy's vessels, mounting in all 69 guns, and the gun boat squadron, a cannonade followed, and continued about one hour and forty-five minutes; in all which time, scarcely a shot struck either of the gun boats, whilst at almost every fire, the latter told upon the hulls of the sloop and frigate. This difference of effect in the firing being discovered by the British, they manned their launches, barges and cutters, ten in number, and despatched them to cut off the boats on the extremity of the line. No. 121, a boat commanded by sailing master Shead, which, by some accident, had fallen a very great distance out of the line, and was prevented from recovering its situation by a strong ebb, and the wind dying away, became the object of attack from the enemy's barges. Eight of them, mounting among them three 12 pound caronnades and carrying one hundred and fifty men, assailed the gun boat at one time. Mr. Shead continued, nevertheless, to sweep her towards the squadron, and to discharge his 24 pounder, alternately, at one or the other of the pursuing barges, until they gained so fast upon him, that he resolved to anchor his boat and receive them, as warmly as the disparity of numbers would permit him. He then gave them a discharge of his great gun, with much effect, though to the injury of the piece, which being fired a second time, and the carriage breaking down, it became necessary to oppose the enemy, who were closing fast, by the boarders. With these, Mr. Shead resisted them, until his deck was covered with men, and the vessel entirely surrounded by the barges. Such was the impetuous fury of the English sailors, that the Americans were driven below, and the authority of the enemy's officers could scarcely protect them from violence. The flag was struck, and the boat carried off in triumph to the men of war. In this assault, the British lost seven killed and twelve wounded. On board the boat, seven men were wounded, but none killed. The squadron was all this time firing at the enemy's ships, who retired after capturing Mr. Shead; the

Martin having been extricated from her situation on the shoal. On board the flotilla not a man was injured, and but one of the boats' rigging cut; this was No. 125, commanded by sailing master Moliere. The engagement continued nearly two hours, and was the last affair, of any consequence, which occurred in the Delaware during this year."

SECOND CAMPAIGN:

The residue of the year 1813, and the first seven months of 1814, were distinguished by nothing but the formation of volunteer corps of the various species of arms, and the recruiting of regular soldiers for distant service. Still there was no organization of the troops into battallions or regiments. Nearly all were strangers, not only to the evolutions of the line, but to the simplest manœuvres of the field. The manual exercise and a knowledge of the drill taught in the school of the company, was the utmost science that most of them could pretend to, and the whole body, with the exception of the few who had served the year before, was almost as little qualified to take the field, as the same number of ordinary militia. The service of the preceding year, had indeed been productive of some beneficial effects, but the grand essential qualification of an army, that of knowing how to act and move in concert, was wholly wanting.

In this defenceless and unprepared condition, not dreaming of danger, were the inhabitants of Philadelphia, on the 26th of August, when the news of the unfortunate battle of Bladensburg, and the capture of the city of Washington, both of which events took place on the 24th, suddenly reached them. All was consternation. Terror was depicted in every countenance. Already had the fears of some anticipated ere that moment the sacking of Baltimore, and not a few were to be found, who predicted the identical day when the enemy would dictate to Philadelphia the terms of her capitulation. These alarms however premature, had a most happy effect. They taught the people the folly of slumbering whilst the foe was at the gates, and aroused the dormant spirit of thousands who had hitherto regarded danger as at a distance. A public meeting of the citizens was immediately convened, and a committee of defence was appointed with ample power to adopt such measures as the urgency of the occasion might demand.

Concurrently with this measure, General Bloomfield resolved upon organizing a camp, and upon accepting the services of such volunteer corps, as were prepared to offer. With that view he despatched an officer of the regular army to select a suitable spot at Kennet's Square in Chester county, about thirty-six miles south west of Philadelphia, thirteen miles from Wilmington, and 8 or 9 from Chad's ford. This place was designated as the point of rendezvous, and some companies immediately took up their march and proceeded to the spot.

The First City Troop of cavalry commanded by Capt. Charles Ross, marched at the same time, for Mount Bull, a height on the Chesapeake, five miles from Turkey Point and thirteen miles from Elkton, commanding an extensive view of the bay, where it established its permanent head quarters, and from which a line of videttes, extending to the City, and communicating daily with the camp, was formed.

The companies as they arrived on the ground at Kennet's Square, which was designated as Camp Bloomfield, were posted, and a course of discipline and duty strict as that which was practised in the regular army, was at once introduced. To this rigid system, originally enforced by Capt. Charles W. Hunter, acting as Brigade Major under General Bloomfield, and subsequently adhered to by the respective officers in command, is chiefly to be ascribed the high character which The Advance Light Brigade then in its primitive discordant elements, afterwards acquired. On the 7th of September, Lieut. Col. Clemson of the U. S. Army assumed the command of the troops, which were by this time reinforced by some companies of regulars. On the 14th Brigadier General Cadwalader who had a few days before been appointed by the Governor to the command of the First Brigade of the First Division of Pennsylvania Militia, and who arrived in camp on the preceding day took command and relieved Col. Clemson, who a few days afterwards moved with the regular troops to take up a position near Iron hill a few miles in advance of the Brigade. On the same day upon which the General took command, the Infantry in camp at that time consisting of eight companies, were organized into a Regiment by the election of the field officers whose names appear on the annexed muster roll. On the 16th of the same month the companies of Artillery were organized into a Battalion of which Capt. Prevost was chosen Major*.

On the 17th of September, the Brigade took up the line of march, proceeded on the road towards Wilmington, and encamped in the evening on Gregg's farm about three and a half miles from that town. On the 20th it changed its position by removing to a field half a mile distant. On this spot designated in the orders as "Camp Brandywine" it continued until the 29th when, as it was intended to take up a permanent position, a more eligible scite for water and salubrity was selected at the distance of about two miles in a western direction, which was occupied on the last mentioned day. To this encampment was given the name of DUPONT, from the proprietors of the ground, whose extensive Manufacturing establishments on the Brandywine, are so well known. It was on this field that the Brigade by a constant attention to discipline and tactics acquired so perfect a knowledge of that part of the military art which relates to evolutions, and the duties of a camp, that it was considered by experienced officers to have had no superior in the service.

In the month of November some apprehensions having been entertained by General Gaines then commander of the District that the enemy, who had during the whole summer and autumn maintained his position at the mouth of the Delaware, meditated a landing on some part of its western shore ordered Colonel Irvine of the Army who at that time occupied a station two miles below New Castle on the Frenchtown road, with a detachment of regular troops, to proceed with his command some distance below, and directed General Cadwalader to replace him with six hundred men. - The companies detailed for this service were, as follows viz.

* On the 14th of November the same Artillery Companies with the others which subsequently arrived in camp were organised into a Regiment by the election of the field officers whose names appear on the muster roll.

The order for this movement was received on the afternoon of the 15th of November, and under circumstances which created a general belief that a meeting with the enemy would shortly take place. On the morning of the 16th. this Detachment, under the command of Lieut. Col. Raguet proceeded to the designated spot, where it arrived after a march of thirteen miles by 2 o'clock. The staff appointments having been made by the commanding officer, the organization of the Detachment stood as follows:

The detachment reached the ground occupied by Colonel Irvine just at the moment that officer was leaving it, where it continued without the occurrence of any material event until the latter end of the month. A commissioned officer was daily detailed and stationed at New Castle, for the purpose of collecting from travellers, sea faring people and watermen, such intelligence respecting the position and operations of the enemy as might be obtainable, and a report of the result of his inquiries was made to the commanding officer. In addition to this source of intelligence a line of videttes had been extended from Port Penn at the head of the Delaware Bay to Camp Dupont by Capt. Ross's troop which was ordered to communicate with the detachment, and by this means a daily intercourse was maintained between all the branches of the Army. The lateness of the season however deterred the enemy from attempting to ascend the Bay, and all expectation of meeting him in the field was abandoned. Two deserters from the fleet in the Chesapeake fell into the hands of the videttes, who brought them to the camp near New Castle (which was named after the commanding General) where they were examined and sent under guard to the City to be delivered over to the Marshall.

On the 28th of November, in consequence of cold heavy rains which filled many of the tents with water, and rendered the ground (which was nevertheless the best scite for an encampment in the vicinity) so slippery with clay, as to be almost impracticable for the sentries to walk their rounds, the camp of the detachment was broken up, and the troops were marched into quarters at New Castle, where a church, the court house and a private dwelling were politely offered by the inhabitants for their reception. All the rules of discipline and duty which were applicable to quarters were enforced, and a proper and correct deportment was observed to the citizens, whose hospitality during the continuance of the detachment in the neighbourhood had been conspicuous.

On the morning of the 30th of November, the Brigade broke up its encampment at Dupont, and marched into Wilmington, where it was joined by the Detachment from New Castle. The whole left Wilmington and reached Chester on the ensuing day and on Friday the 2d of December early in the afternoon entered Philadelphia. Such a sight as the march of a body of three thousand well disciplined and uniformed soldiers with all their baggage and munitions of war, had not been witnessed since the period of the Revolution and it may safely be said that a more proud and joyous day was never before experienced by the inhabitants of Philadelphia.

The very flower of the youth and the best hopes of the nation, citizens of every rank and profession and of every political name, were there commingled in the ranks, united in a common cause the defence of their country, and exhibiting to the monarchies of Europe the glorious spectacle of practical equality. Wives met their husbands, parents their sons, and sweethearts their lovers, with all the anxious delight, so incident to a separation which involves the absent party in peril, for although no occasion of meeting the enemy had been presented, yet an expectation of service on the field of battle, was perpetually and universally entertained, and the present moment was only regarded as an armistice which would be followed in the spring by an early and sanguinary campaign.

The service upon which the first City Troop was engaged, was of too important a nature to admit of its returning with the Brigade, and it was accordingly detained on duty a short time longer, and did not reach the City until the 12th. of December.

In addition to the advance Light Brigade a great body of Troops amounting to near ten thousand men was assembled in the neighbourhood of Marcus Hook, twenty miles below Philadelphia, on the Delaware, under the command of Major General Isaac Worrall. This force began to assemble in September, and did not finally break up its encampment until the 5th of December. It was composed of Militia from various counties in the State, and a respectable number of volunteer corps. As General Cadwalader reported directly to the commander of the District, and as his Brigade acted independently of the troops at Marcus Hook, very little intercourse was maintained between the two bodies. With the latter therefore we had not a sufficient acquaintance to enable us to speak of their discipline.

During the autumn of 1814, a considerable number of volunteer companies were organized in the city and county, but did not take the field. The citizens also under the direction of the committee of defence occasionally occupied themselves in constructing breast works or fortifications on the west side of the Schuylkill, and a martial spirit seemed to have been so extensively diffused through the whole community, that there would have been no want of soldiers for the ensuing campaign, had occasion required them.

The Brigade was not dismissed from the service of the United States immediately after its return, but was held subject to future orders. On the 11th. of December, General Cadwalader was named by General Gaines on his departure to New Orleans in general orders, as his successor in the command of the fourth United States military district, by which occurrence the command of the Brigade devolved upon the senior officer, Colonel Biddle. The troops were mustered, inspected and dissmissed in the following order.

Capt. Keims' company on the 5th. December.

Capt. Anderson's company on the 6th. December.

Capt. Serrill's company on the 6th. December.

Capt. Ross's troop on the 12th. of December.

Col. Humphreys Regiment of Riflemen on the 12th. December.

Capt. Bache's company of Flying Artillery on the 24th. December.

Capt. Rawle's troop of Cavalry on the 24th December.

Lieut. Col. Berry's detachment of militia on the 2d. of January 1815.

Col. Biddle's Regiment of Infantry on the 3d. January, Lieut. Col. Prevost's Regiment of Artillery on the 3d. Januray.

The preliminary articles of Peace signed at Ghent on the 24th. of December were ratified by the President on the 18th. of February and put an end to the aspiring hopes of those who were fondly anticipating the operations of another year.

ADDRESS OF THE EDITOR.

The materials which compose this volume have been arranged under the inspection of a gentleman who served as an officer in the advance light brigade; and it is hoped that the advantages of such a publication will be evident to all who are actuated by a true esprit du corps. The recollection of military scenes in which one has acted a part, is always accompanied with a degree of pleasure: but, independent of that consideration, there is scarcely an individual who may not, at some future period of his life, have occasion to refer to events which may have had some connection with the war. Nay, improbable as it may appear, the day will arrive with many, when some proof of their having actually borne arms in defence of their country may be of essential benefit to them or their families. There are, no doubt, at this moment, many of the veteran soldiers of the revolution suffering with want, merely because they have not been able to recollect the names of living comrades, who could bear testimony to the justice of their claims; and although it is not to be expected that pensions will ever be granted to the volunteers who served during the late war, yet occasions may frequently be presented, wherein a patriotic devotion to the cause of the country will operate as a consideration for the conferring of appointments, favours, or employments. More especially would this be the case should our country be again engaged in war. Those who were already acquainted with the discipline of troops, the practical duties of a camp, and the various movements of an army, would naturally be looked to, as the most capable to organise re-inforcements; and it is not improbable that many of those who served in the ranks in 1814 will, at a future day, occupy the most distinguished stations in the line.

The difficulties attending this compilation have far exceeded the anticipations of the editor. Very few of the commanding officers had retained muster rolls of their respective corps, and there was no mode of procuring most of them but from the state pay-master. Every care has been taken to insert the names of all who were attached to the brigade, and to avoid mistakes; but, notwithstanding this, it is probable that there are some omissions, and erroneous spellings, which, however, cannot be ascribed to the editor, but to those from whom the muster rolls were received, or by whom they were originally furnished.

As it is probable that there are many individuals who would be desirous of furnishing themselves with positive evidence of their having served in the field during the late war, it is respectfully recommended to them to procure from the commanding officers of their respective companies a certificate of their service in the following form, or in any other which may be more minute. A blank leaf is left for the purpose.

CERTIFICATE.

A. B.

" THIS IS TO CERTIFY, That A. B. whose name
 " is written with his proper hand on the margin hereof,
 " faithfully served, until honourably discharged, as a private
 " vate in captain J. R. M's. company, being the second
 " company of the First Regiment of Pennsylvania Vo" lunteer Infantry, attached to the Advance Light Bri" gade, in the service of the United States during the " campaign of one thousand eight hundred and fourteen.
 " Witness my hand this 16th day of November, 1820.

The certificate should be signed by the captain of the company, or in case of his decease or absence, by the surviving senior officer. A statement of the age of the party, and some description of his person as to height and appearance, at the time of the date of his certificate, might perhaps be useful in cases where there are several of the same name.

ADVERTISEMENT.

The publisher of this work will shortly put to press a copy of the principal military orders issued during the campaign of 1814. These documents, whilst they will revive the recollection of many interesting incidents connected with the expedition, will serve to shew the system of discipline maintained in the camp as well as the sentiments entertained by the general commanding the District of the efficiency of the Advance Light Brigade. They will also shew, that an expectation of meeting with the enemy was constantly entertained, and that although the tour of duty was performed without bloodshed yet that it was accompanied by all those cares, solicitudes, and watchfulness, which are inseparable from a military life within reach of danger. The exposure of the men too, most of whom had never before slept a night in the open air, to the nocturnal damps and fogs of September and October, and the chilling frosts of November, although productive of very little disease, must be ranked amongst military hardships. Terrific storms of lightning, the vivid flashes of which were subject to the attraction of thousands of bayonets, at times threatened annihilation to the magazine, and an awful destruction to the many who slept within its reach. Cold rains, one of which lasted for nine days almost without intermission from the north-east, were not unfrequent. Storms of wind and rain at night sometimes blew away entire tents, and left their sleeping inhabitants without a shelter from the blasts; at other times the prostrate tents suddenly wrapped in their watery folds the slumbering tenants, who with difficulty extricated themselves from the cold adhesive sheets, without a single change of clothes that had escaped the drenching of the falling torrents.* Towards the close of the campaign the ground was frozen so hard, as to render it impracticable to drive tent pins, and the degree of suffering experienced by many of our patriotic fellow soldiers, who left their distant homes in warm weather, and who had not been supplied with winter clothing, was by no means inconsiderable. And yet under all these circumstances, scarce a murmur was to be heard, but on the contrary, a degree of merriment and hilarity was universally exhibited.

The publisher cannot but think that the proposed publication will be highly useful as a book of instruction to volunteers and others, who may hereafter be called into military service, as it will contain the system of discipline established at Camp Dupont, which rigidly enforced, made the Advance Light Brigade what it was.

MARTIAL MUSIC.

After the close of the campaign of 1814, a collection of military airs was published by George E. Blake, No. 13, south Fifth street, entitled "The Martial Music of Camp Dupont." This work was arranged by the same gentleman under whose inspection the present has been conducted, and contains all the music of the fifes, as well as the principal marches performed by the band. The different airs of the Reveillee, Troop, Retreat and Tattoo, are included, together with all the minor tunes belonging to the various beats in camp. To officers and others who wish to be acquainted with the music of a camp, this collection will be useful. The price is $ 2.

* The dreadful storm which during the night of the 27th of October, 1814, caused such devastation in the camp, will never be forgotten by those who witnessed it.
